How do I build a Website?

Once you have decided what you want on your website you can either hire a professional web designer, or you can build the website yourself.

There are several programs available for you to use to build website, the most common one is Microsoft FrontPage. Building websites using this program is as easy as using a program like Word or Excel, and you do not need to know special computer codes or languages.

Programs like Word or Publisher aren't made for creating websites and aren't the right thing to use.

How do I get my Website online?

Once your website is built you will need to upload your web content so people can see your website on the Internet. The type of program used to upload this content is an FTP program.

Some programs such as Microsoft FrontPage have a function built in which allows you to upload your website directly from the program. For information on how to use this, read the 'help' section of the program.
